Background Information: The Seven Years War

The Seven Years War took place between 1756-1763 and represented the first global conflict, fought on multiple continents. The French and British forces in North America, based by New France and the Thirteen colonies respectively, clashed over territorial dominance and influence in the area. The colony of New France was lead by its governor General Marquis de Vaudreuil, its intendent, Francois Bigot. The Lieutenant General of the French military force was Marquis de Montcalm.

Canada will be taken this campaign, and assuredly during the next, if there be not some unforeseen good luck, a powerful diversion by sea against the English Colonies, or some gross blunders on the part of the enemy.

The English have 60,000 men, we at most from 10 to 11,000. Our government is good for nothing; money and provisions will fail. Through want of provisions, the English will begin first; the farms scarcely tilled, cattle lack; the Canadians are dispirited; no confidence in M. de Vaudreuil or in M. Bigot. M. de Vaudreuil is incapable of preparing a plan of operations. He has no activity; he lends his confidence to empirics rather than to the General sent by the King.

If the wars continue, Canada will belong to the English, perhaps this very campaign, or the next. If there be peace, the Colony is lost, if the entire government be not changed ...
